

you, believe me. They must not be allowed to suspect anything, but when we are alone we shall be as strangers. I shall not even talk to you if you do not wish it. There is plenty of time for you to decide. I am asking nothing for myself—I know that that is fruitless—but I am pleading for the little mother and the father."

He turned as he finished speaking and left her alone.

It seemed scarcely five minutes before she heard his voice again. "The Aylwin train is coming," he said. "Shall I get a ticket?"

"Yes," she answered simply.

The cars were crowded, but he found a seat, and, putting her in it with the old air of proprietorship that had always been so sweet to her, he seated himself beside her in silence.

The train rattled on, and as they sat so near together, yet so very far apart, the thoughts of each turned to the last time they had traveled that road together, on their first visit home after their honeymoon.

How happy they had been then! How happy they might have been now if only that little rift within the lute—

Through the mind of each the same questions rang—had there been just and sufficient cause? A little patience, a little forbearance, a little sacrificing of pride at the beginning—

Chatterton looked down at the slight figure beside him. They would not be able to deceive the little mother after all. Happy? With the old sparkle all gone from her eyes and those pathetic little lines about her mouth! And he had sworn to love her, to cherish her and protect her through good and ill till death should part them. Instinctively his hand closed over hers as it lay listlessly on the seat beside him.

At the touch of his fingers she turned, and something shone in her eyes as she drew closer to him.

"Dear," she said softly, "I'm so lonely, so tired and so sorry. Will you?"

His firm clasp of the hand tightened as the conductor threw open the door and shouted, "Aylwin next station!"

"Hush," he whispered. "It was all my fault, little girl. I have been a brute, but all the rest of my life I shall make atonement for, we'll start all over again, and—we won't have to act a lie to the little mother, will we, Madda?"

And, though she answered nothing in words, each understood and was happy.

No Windfalls For Him.

"When I read of folks finding bank notes stuffed in old sofa pillows and cushions," said a west side dealer in secondhand household furniture to a New York Times man, "it just makes me ready to cry. Half the stories printed about such finds I don't believe. I've been in this business thirty-one years right here in little old New York. I've made it a point of gathering in all sorts of odds and ends from old cranks that I thought would be likely to hide money. I've never left anything like a pillow or a thing where money could be hidden in any lot I bought outright, although I've had to brave many a pitiful appeal for father's tobacco box and mother's sewing basket. I never let any piece of furniture go out of here again until I have been through it myself. Wife and I have pulled hair stuffing out of things and put it back again when we could have saved ourselves trouble and money by letting the stuff go out for sale without it. Find anything? Not a cent. Once I found an old book hidden in a mattress that was bought from a woman who died. I took it to a bookseller, who said it was not worth my car fare. No, sir; the only way to get money in this business, like any other, is to work for it and not expect to find it."

Rain Brought No Orders.

Philip D. Armour one day received a very long letter from an agent in regard to conditions of trade in the country through which he was traveling. Page after page was devoted to telling his employer that the weather and uncertain crop conditions were responsible for the meager orders and not a lack of energy or perseverance on his own part. Rain was needed in that section. With the first downpour hope would enter into the despondent community, and an order commensurate with the benefits granted to a parched earth could be expected. Rain saturated the earth, lengthy letters continued to arrive, but no orders.

"How about orders?" wrote the merchant, who was weary of footing non-productive expensive accounts and reading long letters. "Write and let me know in the fewest possible words what merchants say now that they have rain."

By return mail the famous merchant received a letter which told him in a few words the reception accorded the agent in the newly drenched territory, "Dry up, old man, dry up."

Not Friends; Just Gushers.

In a big department store a dainty, pretty little woman in the act of buying some lace caught sight of another pretty little woman who was buying some ribbon. As their eyes met both shoppers dropped the articles at which they had been looking and rushed into each other's arms.

"Old and dear friends reunited after many years," thought the clerk behind the counter.

At last the time for parting came.

"Now do come and see me real soon," said the first woman.

"Oh, I never pay calls, you know," replied the other. "You come and see me."

"Well, I don't know your address."

"It is the last house on — street, next to Riverside drive."

"But I do not know your name since your last marriage."

It was then that the clerk woke up to the real situation.

"Just a pair of gushers," he said himself disgustedly.—New York
